How the Accidental Locavore Survived Hurricane Irene

After going through the motions of emergency preparedness for Irene, the Accidental Locavore started to focus on the important stuff: what we were going to eat if there was no power. Cooking through the contents of a full fridge and big freezer was an option, however some things that didn't need much if any preparation would probably be a good idea. Smoking a chicken is easy, so I butterflied one and, after brining it overnight tossed it on the smoker. Three hours later, a beautiful bird and one that would keep if the power were off for a while.

Something About (Stuffed) Tomatoes, A Recipe

Most of the year, the Accidental Locavore wishes it was summer, so when it's actually upon us, it's time to enjoy everything the season has to offer! Probably the big winner, food-wise, is tomatoes. There is very little that can beat a fresh tomato, perfectly ripe and smelling like the essence of summer.

While most of the time, I'm content to just cut them up and toss into a salad, or mix with some local mozzarella and basil from the garden, occasionally the Locavore yearns for an old French favorite, stuffed tomatoes. Now, I'm not talking about breadcrumb stuffed tomatoes, or a tomato gratin, but what I fell in love with in Paris so many years ago, the sausage stuffed ones you find in every boulangerie in the summer.
