Grilled Broccoli or Grill Pan vs. Smoke Detector

The Accidental Locavore should have known it was coming.... I was working on a batch of grilled broccoli from Ottolenghi, the Cookbook, which calls for broccoli to be cooked on a very hot grill pan. In the middle of balancing the broccoli, searing some rabbit sausage and cooking lentils, the smoke detector goes off. Since ours is hard-wired, that means a call from the alarm company wanting a password before inquiring if the house is indeed burning down. So there I am, desperately trying to get a window open, while balancing the phone, trying to remember the password for the alarm company (which is different from the one that turns the damn alarm off), with a hot and smoking grill pan full of broccoli.

Gabriel Rucker at DeGustibus: Food & Fun!

Thanks to a very generous aunt, the Accidental Locavore has had the chance to take a lot of classes at DeGustibus. When I can't make up my mind about which one to take, Emmy, the booker, is always great about making suggestions. Food is always a criterion, but often we'll discuss how handsome the chefs are. This time, she suggested Gabriel Rucker of le Pigeon in Portland (Oregon) and it was one of the most enjoyable nights spent on Macy's eighth floor!
