Blogging Boomer's Carnival: Sandy Edition

Welcome to the Blogging Boomer's Carnival, a compendium of blogs by and for Baby Boomers (and those who love them). For those of us living on the East Coast, or more specifically, New York City, this has been a very tough week. While we were lucky to escape relatively unscathed, so many of my friends and family have been living without light, heat or water for days now. The devastation from Hurricane Sandy is immense and any donations made to the Red Cross will be greatly appreciated!

Cooking to a Hurricane or How Sandy Helped Clean the Pantry

Unlike so many friends and family, the Accidental Locavore survived the hurricane with power intact. Still, my pre and post-storm strategy to start cooking down the contents of the freezer remained in place. Luckily, the local bodegas were still open, providing missing ingredients as well as a destination for the apartment-weary. So what did I decide to make in the face of impending disaster?
