What's Big and White and Needs a Name?

Sometimes it's hard being the Accidental Locavore. Large, pristine packages show up on your doorstep camouflaging delicious contents like oysters, or in this case, cheese that you have to taste and comment on. My project for today is to write about this nice, big, white slab of cheese from Coach Farms. It's in a mysterious, plain, white wrapper, labeled "raw milk cheese." Part of my challenge is to describe it in such a fashion that one of you will bequeath it with a more stylish moniker. There's an official contest and to enter, check out the culture site. (there's a funny quote at the end). I've also been given this nice picnic bag so keep reading to see how to win that.

For Earth Day: 6 Ways the French are Environmentally Friendly

In honor of Earth Day, the Accidental Locavore wanted to share six of the interesting ways the French (or at least those around the city of Nice) were being environmentally friendly and wondering why we can't do the same. Bringing your own bag to the grocery has been a necessity for a while, however some of the other ways saving energy has become part of the culture were surprising

Indie Food Mags

If you thought that paper magazines had been replaced by shiny digital editions, or that indie mags were limited to the music scene, you'd be missing a lot of quirky, sometimes single-minded food magazines. See what I found for The Daily Meal:
