Dear Friend,

You may be suffering from the cold, but how about freezing in France? A look at art in the South of France, with some good food tossed in.

Pomegranates from the market grace the February calendar.

Frozen in France

Well, it's not what you think. Yes, the Accidental Locavore was in the South of France, and no, there was no snow there (sunny and warm). Out of curiosity, I wandered into a store I've always seen here and never gone in—Picard. It's well known all over France, selling nothing but frozen food. It's so far beyond anything you've ever seen in any grocery store in the US, I thought it would make an interesting story. Read more:

Picasso, Matisse and all the Others

One of the promises the Accidental Locavore has made herself is to look at more art. Being in Nice, you're surrounded by it but there are always special places to check out. Since I didn't have a car this trip, I've been exploring on and with public transportation, which has been easy to figure out (and the locals are always helpful). Read more:
