Cheese Please, Or Not

I know you'll find this hard to believe, but the Accidental Locavore finally found some cheese she didn't love—and it was French! OK, to be fair, it wasn't the cheese I didn't like, it was a French cheese and wine class put on by Artisanal and it was terribly disappointing. If you don't know Artisanal, it's a cheese-centric restaurant with a wonderful collection of cheese that you can also buy (or order) to have at home, so it was doubly disappointing that the class fell so short.

When Life Gives You Cauliflower Greens...

Not normally an avid canner, the Accidental Locavore on occasion will make pickles. On a typical grey fall day recently, I decided to try a couple of different techniques with some of the "extra" veggies I had from Stokes Farm. First up: a beautiful head of cauliflower that had so many greens, I couldn't possible toss them. At a class at De Gustibus with Shea Gallante, he suggested pickling them, like a sauerkraut or kimchee--great idea!

Blogging Boomers Carnival

This is my final posting for the Blogging Boomers' Carnival. It's been a wonderful opportunity to gain experience and exposure to a new audience. Just because it's my last one, doesn't mean it has to be yours.
